

Hey guys, I have an interview coming up as a stockbroker/financial advisor at Morgan Wilshire Securities. As I am very familiar with information on the industry and do fully understand that it is a diminishing field (if not dead already). So as many of you would ask, Why are you getting into it if that has come to your understanding? Well you see I've recently graduated from high school (a year early) so I have a decent amount of time on my hands before I set off to college and I'm honestly just looking for an opportunity at a young age, more of a head start. The main reason being that this firm will be sponsoring me to take my series 7 and series 63 license. So I figured why not just give it a shot as it is a way to get my foot in the door (all I really need). I was seeking advice from people within the industry itself on what is it really like, especially for someone now starting off.
